Visits to national museums and galleries in England.

Following the given task, I have collected some information on the most highly-rated museums and galleries of England, where their popularity is reflected in the number of people who attended them.

On top of the list is, respectively, the British Museum, which attendance level has increased by about 115% - from 2.6 million people in 2013 to 5.6 million in 2017. National Gallery and Tate Gallery, who got into the top as well, have also experienced a significant increase in attendants.

However, Natural History and Science museums do not appeal like they used to - since 2013 the numbers of people who are eager to go there had decreased, the lowest level being 1.3 million in the Science Museum in 2015 (after the peak of 3.8 million two years before). These museums have lost their popularity, especially when compared to the three top ones, and might need time to gain it back.

The reason of such changes may be the introduction of admission charges in 2014 (hence the decrease in attendance during the following year). The possible solution may be the switching to a more lenient 'course' of fees and charges by providing some discounts or widening the excursion program to draw on more people.

Making a conclusion, it is important to admit that the people visiting museums determine its popularity and, consequently, its well-being. Therefore being able to draw one's attention to the museum and create a good impression is important.
